Overview of Rites of Passage Adventure Weekend for Parents

Background

Rites of passage have played an important role in many cultures for thousands of years. We believe that rites of passage must be relevant and appropriate for each culture, and therefore each culture's practices will be different. However, there are some universal threads that weave their way through the rites of passage of many cultures. We present some of these commonalities here.

Purpose

A primary function of any rite of passage is to allow children to choose a new adult identity in their community. Adults help facilitate this process, and help them gain the skills and understandings that they will need to fulfill their potential as members of the community. Rites of passage mark an important transition, and community members emphasize the importance of the event for both the individual and the community.

The specific processes used at rites of passage are kept confidential. That is so younger members of the community do not receive the adult information before they are ready, because rites of passage are considered sacred and personal and should not be treated casually, and because rites of passage rely on a degree of theater, surprise, and spontaneous response that would be lost if participants knew in advance what was going to happen. However, parents can be fully briefed about all the processes of the Rites of Passage Adventure Weekend (RPAW) upon request.

Staff Screening

All mentors and staff over the age of 18 years participating in a RPAW have successfully passed state and nationwide background checks. Any man who has not completed this step will not be permitted to participate in the RPAW.

Transition in a wild or primitive setting

The isolation of the natural setting removes participants from the routines and patterns of their lives so that they can "re-create" themselves. They have the opportunity to let go of old patterns that might no longer serve them. They start fresh, discover new, more mature qualities, and learn and adopt new responsibilities and roles.

The participant has an opportunity to reflect on his new status and to adjust to the enormous changes, which can be exciting, scary, challenging, and confusing all at once. The participant's time away gives the community time to adjust to the changes as well. When the participant returns, he is on his journey to become a man, and the community is also ready to accept him as a member of society in a new way.

Tests of endurance, courage, or competence

Primarily with young males, initiations incorporate physical or emotional tests. This helps the boy discover inner resources that they often don't know exist and gain new self-respect and confidence. It also helps ensure that the initiate is ready for the challenges and responsibilities of the path to adulthood. In this training, the tests are very individual. They are challenging and each boy has the opportunity to test himself in ways that build self-esteem and facilitate growth.

Teaching and learning

In most rites of passage, elders, leaders, teachers, parents, or others teach participants about important aspects of adulthood. The Rites of Passage Adventure Weekend (RPAW) helps boys learn their own lessons. Participants learn about accountability, integrity, personal responsibility, honest communication, connection to feeling, and about the importance of discovering a sense of mission in the world.

Physical Token of Changes

After the boys have faced their challenges at the RPAW, they are honored for having been initiated onto the path to manhood. They are presented with a talisman at a celebration. In addition, the young men are honored with a new status within the Mentoring community; they are now called "JourneyMen," or "JMen" meaning that they are now on the journey to manhood. JourneyMen are offered emotional literacy development and leadership opportunities during the ongoing mentoring program that starts after the RPAW. JourneyMen are eligible to staff as leaders for subsequent Rites of Passage Adventure Weekends.

Some of the primary experiences and lessons a boy gets through the Rites of Passage Adventure Weekend, Mentoring and the JourneyMen Groups

- Respect for the feminine: mother, women, and the feminine community.
- Respect for the masculine. Constructive and supportive ways of being with a community of men.
- Self respect: understanding of one's own unique gifts and of one's inherent worth.
- How to connect with and express feelings in healthy and appropriate ways.
- Encouragement to honor one's own spiritual connection through personal rituals of renewal.
- Knowledge of one's own flaws and limitations.
- Communication skills and emotional literacy.
